The EU General Data Protection Regulation (GDPR) has generated uncertainty in the technology, media, and telecommunications (TMT) industry. Many in the industry are either unsure how their businesses will be impacted, believe regulators won't focus on companies of their size, or believe they are further along in compliance than they are.

At Crowe, we understand every TMT business is different. That is why from the start, we get to know the client's needs, their challenges, their overall risk and budget, and how personal data moves through their organization. Supported by technology like the Crowe Collaborative Risk Manager, Crowe is able to quickly and accurately find out where a company's data is most exposed, and with that information, develop a customized strategy to close those gaps.

Sustained by an in-depth understanding of the GDPR and other global and domestic privacy regulations, the Crowe team works with clients to create practical, risk-based approaches that are specific to businesses' needs. Data protection specialists work closely with cybersecurity professionals, helping to streamline projects and provide comprehensive solutions. On every project, Crowe works closely with clients to help solve not only today's compliance challenges, but to be better prepared for tomorrow.

Because at Crowe, we know being GDPR-compliant is more than securing data. It's also securing a company's reputation, it's securing trust with consumers, and it's building confidence in clients that the company has a plan in place to help with future compliance and make uncertainties a thing of the past.
